COSTIERA

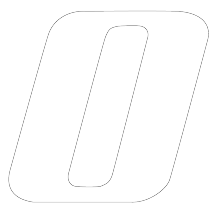

"The car slices through the hills of Sorrento, the sea glittering on one side, the road unwinding on the other before coming to a stop. There's a sense of nervous excitement in the air, we set off on a whim, chasing the memory of long-lost Italian cousins, and now here we are under lemon trees and blooming prickly pears. The scent of salt and citrus wraps around us. A small beach in blue and white stripes waits just below. Moored at the dock, a red boat is rocked by the morning waves. Next to the door with the number 41 hand-painted on a ceramic plaque, there's a cluster of hanging coral that welcomes those who enter and blesses those who live there. We ring the bell."

EDDIE

"It's well past 11:30 PM, the office is deserted, and the muggy heat of the city seeps through the walls. I forgot to have dinner, again, I light myself a cigarette just the same. This case is pulling me deeper into a spiral of clues and riddles. The metallic hum of an old fan sets the rythm of my thoughts, as my eyes wander from a box of cold pizza to leftover noodles. I wonder if they're still good, I don't even remember ordering them. The desk mirrors my life: a kind of organized chaos that somehow comforts me. Cups with stale coffee, post-its everywhere, an old matryoshka doll, leftover food, a photo of my dog. The phone rings and jolts me upright, who could be calling at this hour?"

CARAVAN

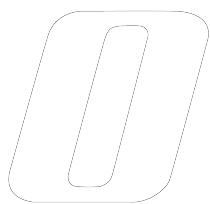

"Tomorrow I'm leaving, but tonight we celebrate. Plump women in colorful skirts and travelers with golden teeth dance to the rhythm of violins around the bonfire. I climb the wooden steps of the most ornate vardo, bend down to enter, and close the little door behind me. The exterior and interior of the wagon are covered in golden engravings of wild horses and mandalas in bloom. The air is saturated with a woody scent of incense, and numerous wind chimes hanging from the ceiling tinkle a dissonant melody. I settle into red cushions in front of an old woman with her head bowed. I stay silent and wait for her jewel-heavy fingers to finish shuffling a deck of cards. Around her neck, a heavy medallion depicting a hand enclosed in a heart swings as if to keep time. Suddenly her eyes meet mine, and knowing the moment has come, I hold out the palms of my hands."

DANCE

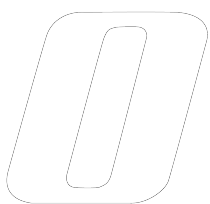

"The big day draws near, everything must be perfect. I have to be perfect too. In the empty locker room, I move through the steps once more, eyes closed, arms open to the silence. I can almost see it clearly, running along the walls in a sequence of pirouettes and leaps. I open my eyes, and the room keeps dancing with me."
